CHAPTER 15

“Come on . . . you’ve got to go too!” Craig told the sleeping wolf. “You’ve got to leave!”

His message was totally ignored. The old fellow continued to snore away, making no more response than flicking his ears in his sleep.

Craig tried again:

“There are men on the way here and Nurek needs your help to frighten them away. He says you must go into the forest.”

Nothing.

He wasn't sure how far he dared go with physical efforts to rouse the old wolf. If Lurrar took offence and snapped at him, he would come off very much the worse. Even a cuff round the head from one of those massive paws would knock him over.

But he had to do something.

He went round behind Lurrar's head, where Lurrar wouldn't be able to reach him easily, and took hold of one of Lurrar's ears.

He counted one . . . two . . . three . . . and then bit, and beat a hasty retreat backwards, as Lurrar shook his head angrily.
